PERSONAL STATEMENT

I am a practicing physician-scientist with training in anesthesiology and critical care medicine who has been committed to optimizing health care and health outcomes for more than fifteen years. The first part of my career was focused on patient safety and quality improvement with a special focus on teamwork, communication, and care coordination across transitions. My current focus is on implementation science, the scientific study of planned behavior change under organizational constraints. The research that I lead combines implementation science and human factors engineering, while my collaborative work is focused on applying implementation science to bolster maternal health and health equity. As a leader in implementation science, I work to advance the field through collaborative projects, pioneering methodology, and building capacity. My work in implementation science is increasingly focused on care equity and the use of theory-driven behavioral change approaches to dismantle systemic inequities. As a research mentor and educator, I work with undergraduate, graduate, and post-graduate students, fellows, and early-stage faculty to build their capacity to conduct impactful, paradigm-shifting health services research.
